

IN THE ABSTRACT:

A toothed transmission belt comprises a metal core including two mutually parallel and spaced apart metal strips, substantially coplanar to each other, and a plurality of metal cross-members, distributed according to a constant pitch in the longitudinal direction of the belt, which connect the two metal strips to each other.

(Figure 1)